Wagon makers would go out into the woods and choose particular trees to fell and season for their work. Where the finished part of the wagon was curved or shaped they would choose trees and branches with that same curve rather than cut a curve from a straight piece of timber.